

Amie Pike's Ragtime Syncopations.

If the things of life were to be weighed by the amount of pain their neglect brings, Duty would be found the greatest. Duty may mean Love, but it usually means Work—there are few bigger things than Work.

If you believe the office you fill could go along without you, you are not filling it.

Youth dreams away much time which could be turned into dollars and cents; but then, who can buy Youth's dreams with dollars and cents?

A sense of humor is the best cloak for misfortune, but when the brambles of disaster form a hedge along the path, it may catch and tear, revealing the ugliness of the wearer.

When a girl begins to cut out ice cream and theater tickets, she is either engaged to him, or hopes to be.

An unforgiving nature requires the greatest forgiveness.

Men need names in business and society, but in a cemetery one monument would do for all, and the inscription should be a blank.

Many a man marries a girl, not because he falls in love with her, but because he falls in love with her idea of him.

When we think of the amusements which daily draw and release crowds of people from the world over, it makes us wonder whether the world is any more civilized than it was in the beginning. The childishness of most of the spectacles which people flock to see, bespeaks a childishness in the minds of those who witness them.

We remember, when we were children, the boy who gained vast wealth, consisting of marbles, pins, tops, etc., through the exposition of a sore finger, which was otherwise guarded most jealously. A great many of the amusements of today are of that order. If it were only the children who are anxious to see them, this might be excused, but the majority of the spectators are always adults.

Life is certainly an interesting phenomenon, but it seems strange when we consider that the reckless endangering of life in some cases, for the sake of a momentary amusement, is considered an amusement. We are horrified to hear of, or witness, the death or injury of a loop-the-looper, but we gladly pay to see some man come within an inch of death by attempting the feat. We do not want him to die, but we want him to come so near it that it makes us hold our breath, and we call that amusement. If he died it would be a tragedy, but if he lives it is an amusement. The prize fight is considered a most brutal amusement, especially by some school-teachers, ministers and women. It must be admitted that it has not the refinement of an afternoon tea, but it is no more foolish than other amusements witnessed by those who object to it, and indicates no more crudeness in the sense of what amusement means than other forms of entertainment indulged in without a thought. No form of amusement is innocent while it desires to see him approach death at any moment. To play with death has always been the favorite amusement of the world. The only difference between this and other times is that the people of other days liked to see the color of a man's blood, while we moderns, shuddering at the thought of such brutality, only desire to see him approach death so near that if he took one false step, there would be an end of him without anything so disgusting as the flowing of wounds while the victim is alive.

This is one of the features of present-day civilization. A man may see him gamble his money without falling in the estimation of the respectable, but we are waiting at the gate in crowds with the coin to see him gamble with his life.

Santa Comes But Once a Year.

And This Week He'll Be at Walker's
Waiting for the Children.

His ruddy, cheery old face wears a broader smile than ever before because he's so glad to be back again with the children. A whole year to be away does seem such a long time. Then he's glad, too, to find our little folks' land prepared just to his liking. The toys all set out on shelves, that every little girl and boy may see them well and determine exactly which one Santa must be told to bring. Besides, the wonderful, wonderful lots of all kinds pleases him—looks so like his own workshop way up near the north pole. Tomorrow until Christmas Eve are "at home" days here, and every child in Salt Lake is invited to call.
